[The significance of N-acetyl-beta-D-glucosaminidase in serum of patients with inflammatory bowel diseases]. In the patients with ulcerative colitis and Crohn's disease, serum N-acetyl-beta-D-glucosaminidase (NAG) activity was measured by the spectrophotometer, and the relationship between NAG activity and various clinical features was examined. The mean serum NAG activity in patients with Crohn's disease was significantly higher than that in healthy controls. The mean values of NAG activity in patients with Crohn's disease were as follows: in the active stage 3.3 U/L (n = 18), in the inactive stage 3.3 U/L (n = 7), and in the remission stage 3.1 U/L (n = 12). The mean serum NAG activity in the patients with ulcerative colitis was significantly higher than that in the controls. The mean values were as follows: in the active stage 5.0 U/L (n = 2), in the inactive stage 2.8 U/L (n = 12), and in the remission stage 2.1 U/L (n = 24). The mean values of NAG activity in patients with inflammatory bowel disease in the active stage were significantly higher than those in those in the inactive stage and in the remission stage. The present study demonstrates the usefulness of measurement of serum NAG as a clinical marker for inflammation in patients with inflammatory bowel disease. Doing less takes more.
